Construction Moves Rapidly On Virginia Fiber's Plant

A quiet drive through Bent Creek and Gladstone, then over the mountain to Riverville will bring you to the hustle and bustle of the construction site of Virginia Fiber's $50 million paper manufacturing plant.

At first glance one will notice the steel skeleton of the center, or drying, section of the processing plant. Activity is everywhere as workmen pour cement, weld girders and operate giant cranes moving material and equipment into place.

Bull dozers and earth moving equipment are much in evidence as grading for the wood storage yards and railroad beds, parking lots and pollution control equipment sites is going on at a heetic pace.

John Steeley, general manager of the Riverville plant, kindly consented to allow a reporter from the Times-Virginian to tour the construction site, and with Rob Knight, construction superintendant for Virginia Fiber, acting as guide the reporter was introduced to an array of paper manufacturing equipment and was given a brief explanation of how the equipment will be used.

The plant is scheduled to begin production during July 1975 with medium corrugated cardboard as the first product. There has been some speculation that the new plant will move into the manufacture of newsprint, but Knight says, "At this time is pure speculation. There are no firm plans for going beyond the Center section Virginia Fiber's new plant now under construction at Riverville in Amherst County. Plant will open in July 1975 and will employ 150 people during initial operations.
